I.

I, Is in Engliſh conſidered both as a vowel and conſonant; though, ſince the vowel and conſonant differ in their form as well as ſound, they may be more properly accounted two letters.

I vowel has a long ſound, as fine, thine, which is uſually marked with an e final; and a ſhort ſound, as fin, thin. Prefixed to e it makes a diphthong of the ſame ſound with the ſoft i, or double e, ee: thus field, yield, are ſpoken as feeld, yeeld; except friend, which is ſpoken frend. Subjoined to a or e it makes them long, as fail, neigh; and to o makes a mingled ſound, which approaches more nearly to the true notion of a diphthong, or ſound compoſed of the ſounds of two vowels, than any other combination of vowels in the Engliſh language, as oil, coin. The ſound of i before another i, and at the end of a word is always expreſſed by y.

J conſonant has invariably the ſame ſound with that of g in giant, as jade, jet, jilt, jolt, juſt.

Inarching is a method of grafting, which is commonly called grafting by approach. This method of grafting is uſed when the ſtock and the tree may be joined: take the branch you would inarch, and, having fitted it to that part of the ſtock where you intend to join it, pare away the rind and wood on one ſide about three inches in length: after the ſame manner cut the ſtock or branch in the place where the graft is to be united, ſo that they may join equally together that the ſap may meet: then cut a little tongue upwards in the graft, and make a notch in the ſtock to admit it; ſo that when they are joined the tongue will prevent their ſlipping, and the graft will more cloſely unite with the ſtock. Having thus placed them exactly together, tie them; then cover the place with grafting clay, to prevent the air from entering to dry the wound, or the wet from getting in to rot the ſtock: you ſhould fix a ſtake into the ground, to which that part of the ſtock, as alſo the graft, ſhould be faſtened, to prevent the wind from breaking them aſunder. In this manner they are to remain about four months, in which time they will be ſufficiently united; and the graft may then be cut from the mother-tree, obſerving to ſlope it off cloſe to the ſtock, and cover the joined parts with freſh grafting clay. The operation is always performed in April or May, and is commonly practiſed upon oranges, myrtles, jaſmines, walnuts, firs, and pines, which will not ſucceed by common grafting or budding. Miller.

JU'RY. n. ſ. [jurata, Lat. juré, Fr.]

Jury, a company of men, as twenty-four or twelve, ſworn to deliver a truth upon ſuch evidence as ſhall be delivered them touching the matter in queſtion. There be three manners of trials in England: one by parliament, another by battle, and the third by aſſize or jury. The trial by aſſize, be the action civil or criminal, publick or private, perſonal or real, is referred for the fact to a jury, and as they find it, ſo paſſeth the judgment. This jury is uſed not only in circuits of juſtices errant, but alſo in other courts, and matters of office, as, if the eſcheatour make inquiſition in any thing touching his office, he doth it by a jury of inqueſt: if the coroner inquire how a ſubject found dead came to his end, he uſeth an inqueſt: the juſtices of peace in their quarter-ſeſſions, the ſheriff in his county and turn, the bailiff of a hundred, the ſteward of a court-leet or court-baron, if they inquire of any offence, or decide any cauſe between party and party, they do it by the ſame manner: ſo that where it is ſaid, that all things be triable by parliament, battle, or aſſize; aſſize, in this place, is taken for a jury or inqueſt, empanelled upon any cauſe in a court where this kind of trial is uſed. This jury, though it appertain to moſt courts of the common law, yet it is moſt notorious in the half-year courts of the juſtices errants, commonly called the great aſſizes, and in the quarter-ſeſſions, and in them it is moſt ordinarily called a jury, and that in civil cauſes; whereas in other courts it is often termed an inqueſt. In the general aſſize, there are uſually many juries, becauſe there be ſtore of cauſes, both civil and criminal, commonly to be tried, whereof one is called the grand jury, and the reſt petit juries. The grand jury conſiſts ordinarily of twenty-four grave and ſubſtantial gentlemen, or ſome of them yeomen, choſen indifferently out of the whole ſhire by the ſheriff, to conſider of all bills of indictment preferred to the court; which they do either approve by writing upon them theſe words, billa vera, or diſallow by writing ignoramus. Such as they do approve, if they touch life and death, are farther referred to another jury to be conſidered of, becauſe the caſe is of ſuch importance; but others of lighter moment are, upon their allowance, without more work, fined by the bench, except the party, traverſe the indictment, or challenge it for inſufficiency, or remove the cauſe to a higher court by certiorari; in which two former caſes it is referred to another jury, and in the latter tranſmitted to the higher. Thoſe that paſs upon civil cauſes real, are all, or ſo many as can conveniently be had, of the ſame hundred where the land or tenement in queſtion doth lie, and four at the leaſt; and they, upon due examination, bring in their verdict either for the demandant or tenant: according unto which, judgment paſſeth afterward in the court where the cauſe firſt began; and the reaſon hereof is, becauſe theſe juſtices of aſſize are, in this caſe, for the eaſe of the countries only to take the verdict of the jury by the virtue of the writ called niſi prius, and ſo return it to the court where the cauſe is depending. Cowel.

The jury, paſſing on the priſoner's life,
May in the ſworn twelve have a thief or two Guiltier than him they try. Shakeſp. Meaſ. for Meaſ.

7. JU'STICE of the Common Pleas. [juſticiarius Communium Placitorum.] Is a lord by his office, and is called dominus juſticiarius communium placitorum. He with his aſſiſtants originally did hear and determine all cauſes at the common law; that is, all civil cauſes between common perſons, as well perſonal as real; for which cauſe it was called the court of common pleas, in oppoſition to the pleas of the crown, or the king's pleas, which are ſpecial, and appertaining to him only. Cowel.

8. JU'STICE of the Foreſt. [juſticiarius Foreſtæ.] Is a lord by his office, and hath the hearing and determining of all offences within the king's foreſt, committed againſt veniſon or vert: of theſe there be two, whereof the one hath juriſdiction over all the foreſts on this ſide Trent, and the other of all beyond. Cowel.

9. JU'STICES of Aſſiſe. [juſticiarii ad capiendas Aſſiſas.] Are ſuch as were wont, by ſpecial commiſſion, to be ſent into this or that country to take aſſiſes; the ground of which polity was the eaſe of the ſubjects: for whereas theſe actions paſs always by jury, ſo many men might not, without great hinderance, be brought to London; and therefore juſtices, for this purpoſe, were by commiſſion particularly authoriſed and ſent down to them. Cowel.

10. JU'STICES in Eyre. [juſticiarii itinerantes.] Are ſo termed of the French erre, iter. The uſe of theſe, in ancient time, was to ſend them with commiſſion into divers counties, to hear ſuch cauſes eſpecially as were termed the pleas of the crown, and therefore I muſt imagine they were ſent abroad for the eaſe of the ſubjects, who muſt elſe have been hurried to the King's Bench, if the cauſe were too high for the country court. They differed from the juſtices of Oyer and Terminer, becauſe they were ſent upon ſome one or few eſpecial caſes, and to one place; whereas the juſtices in eyre were ſent through the provinces and countries of the land, with more indefinite and general commiſſion. Cowel.

These by likelihood, in ancient time, were ſent to countries upon ſeveral occaſions; but afterward juſtices of aſſiſe were likewiſe authoriſed to this. Cowel.

12. JU'STICES of Niſi Prius are all one now-a-days with juſtices of aſſiſe; for it is a common adjournment of a cauſe, in the common pleas, to put it off to ſuch a day: niſi prius juſticiarii venerint ad eas partes ad capiendas aſſiſas; and upon this clauſe of adjournment they are called juſtices of niſi prius, as well as juſtices of aſſiſe, by reaſon of the writ or action that they have to deal in. Cowel.

13. JU'STICES of Peace. [juſticiarii ad Pacem.] Are they that are appointed by the king's commiſſion, with others, to attend the peace of the country where they dwell; of whom ſome, upon eſpecial reſpect, are made of the quorum, becauſe ſome buſineſs of importance may not be dealt in without the preſence of them, or one of them. Cowel.

The juſtice,
